

Matter, Man, and Spirit: Their Relation to Science and Philosophy (Classic Reprint)

The introductory chapter may be read or omitted. The author would advise the reading of the other chapters first. When they are read, if the reader is not satisfied with, certain grounds assumed, then he may read the introduction with probable profit. The author regards this little volume, taken as a whole, as more suggestive than demonstrative. It is a pioneer service in the scope and territory of its thought. Where there is no satisfactory demonstration, it is hoped that the suggestions are sufficient to lead others to meditation and advancement in what has been undertaken. In the survey made the author is well convinced that the world generally, not only in religion but otherwise, is running by the belief of things rather than by knowledge. Hence, he has tried to refrain from all dogmatic expressions. Books are numerous, but no more so than the people. It is believed that only a few books of merit have failed to get the recognition they deserved. This little volume is cheerfully submitted to the reading public with a hope that it may do some good.
